Introduction

If you have had surgery to your breast or axilla (armpit) you may find that your axilla, breast or chest wall area becomes swollen. This is especially likely if you have had some of the lymph nodes (glands) removed from your axilla. This is due to fluid collecting under the wound that the body cannot drain in the usual way. This swelling is called a seroma. It is a common side effect of breast surgery and does not mean that something has gone wrong with your operation.

If you develop a seroma, the fluid can be drained quickly and painlessly by the breast care nurse. This is done at an out-patient clinic and you will not have to stay in hospital.

What are the signs of a seroma?

You may notice an uncomfortable swelling around your scar or under your arm. This may feel quite tight.

When will the seroma need draining?

It is safe to leave the fluid for a few days, especially if the swelling is small. Each time the fluid is removed there is a risk of infection, and it may be best to avoid removing the fluid if possible.

If the swelling becomes large and more uncomfortable, the fluid can be removed. It may collect again, but the body will gradually adjust and dispose of the fluid naturally.
